Category:Books about contemporary history Category:Books by A P J Abdul KalamByrne: How the media can make the iPhone 5 story worse. Before I start, I want to begin by apologizing. I know that the way things ended on The Colbert Report the other night won't endear me to a few out there, but I'm not sure that I can take the heat. In fact, I'd prefer not to. The bad news is, I've not been on the show since I left, so I'm just going to have to be taking the heat right now. Thankfully, there is nobody to blame but me, and there are no excuses either. If anyone reading this has any complaints about the way my character and my set up ended on the show, then I want to take this moment to say that I'm truly sorry. But it's not just me. I've talked to fellow former cast members and found out that a lot of people felt how I felt, and I have a lot of faith in the cast and crew, so I'm pretty sure there will be more apologies to come. So if you're going to complain about it, then complain, but I don't think it's worth it when you have a lot more important things to talk about in this world. So you'll have to trust me when I say that all I want is for the story to end as soon as possible. Now, for anyone out there who caught the episode last night, I know it's a story that involves both the Internet and the media. The Internet because, of course, if you aren't online there's a good chance you'll hear about it online. And the media because, you see, none other than Stephen Colbert, my former boss, was in an on-air interview at the time I called in and was actually about to talk about the story. And since this was a live interview, it had to be aired to the entire world. So, I decided, being the genius I am, that I should bring to Colbert's attention the importance of maintaining secrecy. After all, if we all revealed secrets to the world willy-nilly, wouldn't it make the world a less interesting place? Of course, you may be thinking "but Steve, didn't you know that was the whole reason for doing this? To be the first to reveal this story on television, all because of the Internet?" And to
